Steps:

1. Send the operating statement (property manager's job)
    a. This occurs within five to seven business days for normal operations, but if a holiday falls within this time period, more time is granted
2. Pull the rent roll and get occupancy figured out while waiting for the operating statement
3. Compare against the budget approved in the fall
    a. Anything more than five percent off needs a sentence of explanation
4. Add lines for people special cases (e.g. someone moving out mid-quarter)
5. Send to boss for review
6. Review notes from boss
7. Send out to the investor list around the tenth business day

The starting point:
The starting point is a property manager sending the operating statement. If this slips, the whole rest of the process falls through. Everything else is contingent on this.

One step that does not have to wait:
Pulling the rent roll and getting occupancy figured out can be done while waiting for the operating statement.

Every undocumented rule or unowned decision found:

- Explain anything more than 5% off, or just anything that really jumps out
- Match expensing categories with line items
- It's up to your discretion what to add a line about; be smart
- Take your boss's suggestions

An explicit definition of done:
When all of the steps are complete, revisions are done, and the statement is sent to investors, you are finished.

3 edge cases:

1. A holiday falls within the time period of sending the operating statement.

This can delay the sending process.

2. Something is five percent off. Do you send it? The analyst expresses uncertainty.

If certain metrics are not explained, it may raise concerns for investors.

3. It is the tenth day, but the statement has not yet gone out.

This may also raise concerns for investors.

Contradictions:

- The operating statement is "supposed to be on the fifth business day but is realistically the seventh, later if there is a holiday."
- "Until that lands I cannot do much," but goes on to say that you can pull the rent roll and get occupancy figured out before it lands
- Unsure about the 5% rule

- “Supposed to be the tenth business day. We hit that maybe two thirds of the time.”

Recommendation:
When accountants redo the expense categories, the process of remapping the line categories can be automated. The analyst said this process took “a whole afternoon” without the help of any AI automation. This suggestion can be left with the management team because they’d be able to incorporate it into their business most effectively.
